“Eating was the least of the activities done around our kitchen table. It was primarily a creative space, a work surface, a space for meditation and a social space... It was a female-centred space, where men, women and children worked, dreamt and created...It was a space of action.”

Farrell-Racette, S. Kitchen Logic. Sakewewak Storytellers Festival; 2017.

“ . . . if colonization is fundamentally about dispossessing Indigenous peoples from land, decolonization must involve forms of education that reconnect Indigenous peoples to land and the social relations, knowledges and languages that arise from the land.”

Wildcat, M., McDonald, M., Irbacher-Fox, S., and Coulthard, G. Learning from the land: Indigenous land-based pedagogy and decolonization. Decolonization: Indigeneity, Education & Society, 2014; 3 (3), I-XV.

(1) Decolonizing Space and Place: Demonstrate how an Indigenous land-based and community-oriented research space within a southern, peri-urban campus can be a model of “decolonial Indigenization” and recalibrate our relationships to land.

(2) Indigenous Planning: Investigate how Indigenous land-based knowledge practices inform Indigenous design and planning, and how Indigenous design of space impacts learning.

(3) Indigenous Pedagogy: Evaluate the learning benefits of using land-based pedagogies to transmit Indigenous knowledges in contrast with traditional lecture approaches; inform post-secondary Indigenous education reform by comparing learning achieved at the post-secondary level with and without the use of land-based pedagogies and detailing and scaling best practices.

(4) Indigenous Health and Wellbeing: Determine how experiential Indigenous land-based activities and relationship building impact student and community health and wellbeing.
